Sustainable Leadership

One Army Leader's Views on Leadership and What it Takes to Lead in the Area of Sustainability

The Army Corps of Engineers is known around the world as a premier public engineering organization. It is now pursuing initiatives and opportunities to advance its reputation in the arena of sustainable engineering through new materials, revised processes, and exciting new projects. Army Corps of Engineers District Commander in Los Angeles, Colonel Tom Magness, will showcase ways in which the Corps is embracing this approach. His talk will also weave in what this means to leaders and those who desire to sustain leadership greatness. Colonel Magness is a 23-year Army veteran with a variety of leadership assignments around the world. The District directed by Col. Magness includes 226,000 square miles of Southern California, Arizona, Nevada and Utah, and is responsible for permitting some of the nation's most significant public and private infrastructure projects. The Army Corps is critically important to civil service projects in the United States, in Iraq, and along the US-Mexican border. Col. Magness oversees a $1Billion annual district budget, and is responsible for water resource development and the maintenance of navigation channels at more than a dozen harbors along the California coast. In and around Orange County, he is responsible for flood control projects and environmental restoration projects.
