Insuring California's Future

A View of California's Insurance Marketplace

Orange County's recent wildfires have demonstrated the intensity and unpredictability of nature – but also the impact and reliability of insurance. To that end, Commissioner Poizner is charged with ensuring fairness and openness in insurance and consumer issues, overseeing the California Department of Insurance (CDI), the largest consumer protection agency in the state. CDI, which is responsible for enforcing many of the insurance-related laws of the state, has more than 1,300 employees, a $200 million budget and regulates more than one-seventh of the California economy. Their number one priority is to protect insurance consumers by regulating the industry's practices and encouraging a healthy marketplace, which is one of the largest in the world.

Prior to his election as California Insurance Commissioner, a highly-successful businessman/entrepreneur, Poizner founded several companies, the most recent of which pioneered life-saving technology that put GPS receivers into cell phones. As a result, 9-1-1 emergency responders are able to locate with pinpoint accuracy those making emergency calls from cell phones. This technology is now the industry standard and can be found in more than 200 million cell phones around the world.
